Primate Observes Sumatran Orangutan Using Medicinal Plants to Treat Open Wound

The high levels of intelligence of orangutans have been widely recognized, in part due to their practical skills such as the use of tools to break nuts and search for insects. But new research suggests that the primate has another useful skill in its repertoire: applying medicinal herbs.

The researchers claim that they observed a male Sumatran orangutan treating a facial wound with sap and crushed leaves of a plant known to have anti-inflammatory and analgesic properties.

It is not the first time that wild animals have been observed self-medicating: in other examples, orangutans in Borneo have been seen rubbing their limbs with crushed leaves of a plant used by humans to relieve muscle pain, while chimpanzees have been documented chewing plants to treat infections with worms and applying insects to wounds.

Nevertheless, this new discovery is the first time that a wild animal is observed treating open wounds with a substance known for its medicinal properties.

"Esto demuestra que estas capacidades cognitivas básicas que necesitas para producir un comportamiento así ... eran presentes en el momento de nuestro último ancestro común más probablemente."

Los investigadores dicen que los hallazgos ofrecen insights en los orígenes de los cuidados de las heridas humanas - el tratamiento del cual fue mencionado por primera vez en un manuscrito médico que data de 2200 AC.

El equipo informa en el diario Scientific Reports que hicieron el descubrimiento mientras trabajaban en un área de investigación de un bosque protegido de selva tropical en Indonesia.
