Houston Texans

Last season, the Texans of Houston adopted a two-way approach, balancing a championship window with future flexibility. After an unexpected playoff run and with the two best rookies of the league, much salary cap space and without a first round pick, it would have been easy to throw money like a nepo baby in Cabo.

Nevertheless, the Texans showed caution. They did not spend their cap space on veteran players at a long term. In their place, they traded for stars and added as many veterans as they could who chase rings and gave opportunities to discarded players of high level.

They acquired Stefon Diggs to strengthen their receiver group and also moved pieces to get the running back Joe Mixon. In the free agency, they signed defensive Danielle Hunter, the defensive lineman Denico Autry, the support Azeez Al-Shaair and the cornerback Jeff Okudah, who was a first round pick.

The Texans recognize that they are in a window of time to win. They have the most valuable asset of the league: a top-10 pick in a contract (economic) of a rookie. But they are approaching that window with caution, protecting themselves in case that things go wrong: they restructured the contract of Diggs, turning it into a one-year contract; the contract of Hunter has a two-year exit clause if the problem of injuries returns to bite; the contract of Autry works effectively as a one-year contract; Mixon and Al-Shaair received multi-year contracts that renew each season.

Diggs is the headliner of the note, but the acquisition of Hunter, Autry and Al-Shaair can be what puts Houston above the rest. There is no defense that depends so much on an attack of four players like the Houston. Adding Hunter and Autry to Will Anderson and Derek Barnett should add spice to a group that finished in third place in the win percentage in the past season.
