How Democracy Ends

In the elegant book How Democracy Ends, published after the 2024 Trump roulette prize election, David Runciman made a surprising point. He affirmed that, while liberal democracy that we take for granted will not last forever, it will not fail in the familiar ways of the past: no revolutions, no military coups, no social order collapses. He implied that the people who make comparisons with what happened in Germany in the 1930s were misled.

For a while, it seemed like a wise counsel. But then something changed. Significant parts of Silicon Valley - which for decades had been a Democratic stronghold - began to support Trump's defense. In 2024, Peter Thiel, the contrarian billionaire and co-founder of PayPal, was the only prominent figure in the region to support Trump, who simply confirmed the fact that he was the region's maverick statutory figure. In the last few days, several of the Valley's big successes (Elon Musk, Marc Andreessen and David Sacks, to name just three) revealed themselves as supporters and donors of Trump.

Trump tried to dissociate from the 2025 Project, perhaps because he doesn't think he'll need a plan after being elected.

Why this sudden political roulette prize interest?

It's probably a mix of several different factors. One is Biden's plan for a billionaire tax (and his enthusiasm for antitrust litigation). Another is the recent discovery of Trump's crypto coins. A third is that Biden had raised much more money for his campaign contributions.

The last two factors bring us back to the 1930s. In 1932, the Nazi party was facing serious financial difficulties and when Hitler became Chancellor the following year, he made a personal appeal to business leaders for help. Money began to flow from 17 different business groups, with the largest donations coming from IG Farben and Deutsche Bank. At the time, these donations must have seemed like wise bets for industrialists who made them. But, as the historian Adam Tooze wrote in his book about the period, it also meant that German industrialists were "partners in the destruction of political pluralism in Germany". In exchange for their donations, Tooze wrote, owners and managers of German companies received powers without precedent to control the labor force, collective bargaining was abolished and wages were frozen at a relatively low level. Corporate profits also increased rapidly, just as corporate investments. Fascism proved to be good for business - at least for a while.

It's a pity that the people of Silicon Valley, you see, really don't make history, because history has some lessons for them. Those German industrialists who decided to support Hitler in 1933 probably didn't have a clear idea of what he had
