Australian Olympic athletes who arrived in Sydney were welcomed as heroes at the airport after their successful home campaign, following the Olympic Games. The success was a result of the country's performance up to that point.

The Australian team set a national record with 18 gold and 53 total medals at the Paris 2024 Olympic Games, including their first gold medal of the year.

The Olympic team of 460 athletes arrived in Sydney on Wednesday, greeted by a massive crowd and a ceremony that was long-awaited.

Cam McEvoy, who won a gold medal in the 50m freestyle men's event, said it felt like a long time since his last Olympic medal – since the Tokyo 2020 Games during the COVID-19 pandemic.

"While we were waiting for the hangar, we were all just waiting here and you could feel the excitement in the air to the point where we were almost overwhelmed," he said to ABC News Breakfast.

"It's a bit nervous when you're standing there and you're about to go out there, but it's also a really great experience."

Olympic swimmers Meg Harris and Lani Pallister, who won gold medals at the 2013 World Championships, said they had to wait for their moment to shine in the Nippers event while growing up together.

"I didn't expect the world to move like this," said Harris. "Seeing this support and everything is so incredible, it's one of the reasons why we did so well because we felt so supported around us."

Prime Minister Anthony Albanese welcomed the athletes and said that before their flight, they had already "written their names into Australian sporting history."

"Each of these athletes has left us proud," he said. And when the athletes descended the stairs, not all of them had a medal around their neck – but each one was worth the gold.

"For those of us who were here, we were all so proud and we're all so happy to see you, we want to know how much you've inspired us; it's a joy to have you here."
