Chris Pine disappoints in his debut as director and actor in "The Grand Budapest Hotel"

Chris Pine is generally a charismatic presence on screen, but in this film he is disappointing due to a fragile script and excessive direction - one that could have had something to do with the co-writer (Chris Pine) and the director (Chris Pine himself). You can see what he was trying to do: a comedy-drama of mystery in a foggy, free poker games homage to old Los Angeles, but it's more like Chinatown without the savagery, or Inherent Vice without the brains, or The Big Lebowski without the drugs.

The character of Pine is a diluted version of Jeff Bridges' The Dude (the drink is stronger than what he consumes - it's a mocktail egg cream). He is a vagabond, disheveled and without a goal who lives in a free poker games trailer next to the pool of an apartment complex that he maintains with zen focus. Like the name of his character, Darren Barrenman, he is a little more than a collection of ticks: he makes origami gifts; meditates in the free poker games pool; writes confessional letters to Erin Brockovich. He also wears BR shorts and a pink shirt, but seems to have no wardrobe, and regularly campaigns for public transport on the city council with the help of dioramas. None of this really makes sense.

Pine also convinced some big stars to participate in his ego project. Annette Bening and Danny DeVito are his neighbors and adoptive parents: she is a free poker games therapist, he is filming a documentary about Darren. Jennifer Jason Leigh plays a free poker games girlfriend who is also sleeping openly with his best friend (John Ortiz), among others.

The story starts to drag with the arrival of a femme fatale: impeccably stylish DeWanda Wise, who convinces Darren to get involved in a free poker games plot of conspiracy involving a big real estate developer, the city council and water rights (Chinatown is specifically mentioned several times), but everything is so disorganized and theatrically exaggerated, it's impossible to take it seriously. There are conversations that don't go anywhere, some caricatured detective, some comedy without grace and a plot that is at the same time messy and confusing. And Pine the director is clearly so in love with Pine the actor, that he doesn't know when to stop "cutting!". Like his character, the film plunges quickly into the bottom of the pool, and that's where it should stay.
