Alerta urgente greenbets e confiavel áreas florestais nos Países Baixos: evite com crianças

Dutch authorities have issued an urgent warning to visitors, especially those with young children, to avoid a forested area in the Netherlands, after several incidents involving a wolf, including a child being bitten.

The latest incident occurred on Wednesday morning when "a large animal", supposedly a wolf, killed a child near the village of Austerlitz, approximately 16km (10 miles) east of Utrecht.

The child in the latest incident was not injured, but a teenage girl was bitten 10 days ago in the same area. DNA tests confirmed that a wolf was responsible.

Medidas de precaução e recomendações

The area known as the Utrecht Ridge is heavily forested and is a popular spot for hiking, cycling and running.

Wolves have reappeared in the Netherlands in 2024, after 150 years of absence, with several sightings since then, but the animals remain elusive and generally avoid contact with humans.

The province of Utrecht "asks all visitors to be extremely careful when visiting the Utrecht Ridge area", according to its published statement on Wednesday night. "The advice is not to visit these forests with young children."

In July, a woman reported that a wolf killed her dog. The statement confirmed that the province "is seriously considering that it is the same wolf involved in the previous incidents with the girl and the dog".

Specialists and wolf experts said the animal showed "unusual and disturbing" behavior, according to the statement.

Authorities are preparing a permit to kill the animal as a result of the incidents and also provided instructions on how to behave when you encounter a wolf.

"Don't run, but stand your ground, make gestures or noises. Retreat slowly", according to the instructions.
