Ex-colaborador furioso por crédito roubado por ex-chefe no Brasil

For some years, I accepted a job at a small creative company. I led several high-profile projects. But as I began to receive recognition for my work, the boss started to become increasingly jealous, undermining me in meetings, shouting at me in public, and claiming that I was useless, appropriating credit for projects I led and removing my name from documents I wrote.

After months of harassment, I resigned. I had no other choice. In the same period, two other colleagues also resigned because they were indignant with his behavior.

Today, he is working alone. However, he has taken my work completely and is now getting a job through a process I developed over years. Yesterday, I saw that he is posting a "guide on how to do it" using my work, but claiming it as his own innovation and speaking with authority about it.

I am angry and hurt, and although I have moved professionally, I am full of rage. I feel powerless and silenced. What do I do with these feelings? How do I face h2h betano? What can I do?

Well, what you can do with respect, if there is anything, depends on the details. I spoke with three people: a psychologist Armele Philpotts; a h2h betano rights specialist Giles Parsons and a h2h betano rights specialist Emma Capper da Browne Jacobson.

Parsons explained that, generally, "if you create something in the hiring process, the work belongs to the employer" and his contract probably says so. However, if you were hired as a consultant, or if you entered that job with something like a program or manual, or something you had already developed and written, the situation can be different. "If you had developed a process that was then expanded into a job, you may have some underlying authorial right, but this depends on the contract."

Therefore, there is a possibility that you can hire a lawyer and request a preliminary injunction to prevent your ex-boss from using your work – sometimes, says Parsons, that is sufficient. But there is also the issue of harassment. You can have a case for dismissal if you resign in response to the employer's behavior, but as Capper explains, this can be a difficult claim to bring, and h2h betano lines are general, you have three months after h2h betano resignation to start a claim. However, it may be worth a preliminary consultation with a lawyer in labor law/copyright who can examine your contract and advise you.

Philpotts understands why you were so angry. "You mention anger; that is a very strong emotion and I can see why you feel that way. Anger is a word of limit, your former boss crossed the line and it is not a one-time incident, you continue to find evidence that he is completely stepping on your boundaries."
