A Entidade Tênis (ATP) recently announced that it will trial a series of new rules for doubles matches, starting with the Masters 1000 in Madrid. The aim, according to the organization, is to "improve the product for fans, players, and tournaments." However, there are several concerns regarding these changes.

1. Simplistas vs. Duplistas: The 32-team doubles bracket will have reserved spots for 16 teams made up of players using their singles rankings. The intention is clear: to have singles players face off against doubles specialists. However, this raises the question of whether singles players who lose early in the tournament will still be in the city to play doubles. If they all survive and make it to the second week, scheduling games every day will be challenging. Additionally, the rule mandating that players compete in singles before doubles on days with two matches may result in a small number of doubles games being played late at night in Madrid, which is not ideal for players or spectators.

2. Timing: All matches will take place from Thursday to Saturday during the second week of the tournament. This change may cause confusion and difficulties in scheduling.

3. Reduced time between points: When rallies have fewer than four shots, players will have only 15 seconds, instead of the usual 25 seconds, between points. This could be problematic, as players typically discuss strategies with their partners during this time. Rushed decision-making may result in mistakes and a less enjoyable experience for fans.

4. Quicker side changes: While details are not specific, the ATP initially suggested that there would be no breaks during the first set. It remains to be seen how this will be implemented in practice.

5. Freer spectator movement: Fans will be allowed to move around the arena more freely, which could lead to distractions for players during games. This change also implies that, unlike in singles matches, doubles games are less serious, potentially affecting the perception of doubles within the sport.

While the ATP asserts that these changes come after "lengthy review and consultation with fans, TV channels, and stakeholders," including a dedicated doubles group, it's surprising that no one raised concerns about the potential issues mentioned above. The impact of these changes on the doubles game and the players' experience should be closely monitored throughout the trial period.
