The Football Association gave formal approval for the appointment of the foreign manager, who will replace Gareth Southgate.

The Guardian learned that the executive director, Mark Bullingham, along with his nine colleagues on the board, supported and approached foreign candidates before the opening of the process. They understood the direction endorsed by the request without voting for the online app Bulfordham, although there were some dissenting voices in the electoral process:

A decision by Bullingham to go to the board indicates that the FA has an open mind about who should replace Southgate as manager of the men's national team and is determined to recruit the best candidate. During the discussions of the Board, it is understood that the success of women's leaders in winning the 2024 European Championship by Sarina Wiegman was cited as a good precedent when she was considered as a foreign manager.

Mauricio Pochettino and Thomas Tuchel are the main candidates abroad because both are available after leaving Chelsea and Bayern Munich respectively in the last season.

The English candidates include Eddie Howe, of Newcastle, and Graham Potter, who has been out of work since leaving Chelsea 16 months ago.

The search by the FA is being led by Bullingham and the technical director, John McDermott, who will compile a list of finalists before returning to the board for ratification. Given the next game in England is just a month away - the Nations League draw in the Republic of Ireland on 7 September - the squad must be named 15 days earlier; It is likely that Lee Carsley, manager of the Under-21 team, will be interim:

Carsley could be a candidate to assume the role permanently, given his success in winning the European Sub-21 Championship last summer.

His first senior manager in England, Martin Glenn (the predecessor), named the head coach of the English national team for the final in the last month. Speaking before the British elections, Glenn said that the FA was working on a contingency plan and had no intention of skipping the promotion newsletter.
