When Jerald Walker was a boy, he dreamed of paypal betting sites being a superhero

When Jerald Walker was a child, the director of paypal betting sites school called him to his office and asked what he wanted to be when he grew up. "My answer was: 'God'", remembers Walker, smiling. "He thought I was joking, but I was serious. When he asked again, I said: 'Captain Marvel'. Because I thought about superheroes. I couldn't think of paypal betting sites 'doctor' or 'writer' or paypal betting sites any of the things. I was never worried about what my adult life would be."

Walker was never sure if he would be an adult. He grew up convinced that the world would end in 1972, when he would be eight years old. According to a prophecy, fire and sulfur would fall from the sky, people would run through the streets in a panic, covered in blisters, their faces melting. But, as members of the World Church of God (WCG), Walker and his family would be saved - and miraculously transported to a safe place, probably Petra, in Jordan. "The bad news was that there would be no future, but the good news was: 'You don't need to worry about this. Everything is planned for you.'"

It took a while for Walker, and many others, to realize that WCG was a textual definition of a cult of the end of the world. It was a white supremacist cult, too - the fact that his parents were black didn't seem to matter. It took even longer for Walker to overcome his childhood and become a writer and professor of creative writing, as he is today. The experience "ruined my youth", he says in a video call from his Boston paypal betting sites house. "We thought we were chosen for salvation, but we were chosen for ruin."

Walker knew that his family was different from the start. "We didn't celebrate Christmas or Halloween; we didn't celebrate our own birthdays. Most of the people we knew went to church on Sundays; we went on Saturdays. We weren't supposed to socialize with people who weren't in church," he says. "We tried to keep it as hidden as possible, but there were ways that we simply couldn't hide." At school, when other children were making Christmas decorations for their classroom, Walker and his twin brother James would sit next to each other doing something else. "We said: 'It's against our religion', which was the phrase we always used." Most of the
