It is midnight in July, a hot night in Plaza de Santa Ana, a central square in Madrid, a 78-year-old woman stands at the head of a bank to give a passionate speech to a crowd of 200 people. The thermometer rarely falls below 39C, but despite the heat, a 78-year-old woman stands at the head of a bank to give a passionate speech to a crowd of 200 people.

"You thought we wouldn't be here, Sr. Almeida?" She walks through the crowd, looking for José Luis Martínez-Almeida, Mayor of Madrid, as angry shouts of "Arboricida!" (assassin of trees) punctuate the silence. Her face is immediately recognizable. She is a film star, Marisa Paredes, immortalized in classic Almodóvar films like Salto Alto - just one of many activists trying to prevent what appears to be a concerted campaign to remove trees from the center of Madrid.

Watching a recording of Paredes' emotional speech, I am surprised by her courage. Like many others, I fled the city for the summer, unable to support the extreme heat. Madrid is one of the hottest cities in the world and the summer foliage offers a respite from unbearable temperatures. But a movement similar to the recent decision in Sheffield to employ armed workers to remove trees in the early morning, the administration of Almeida appears to be betting that local residents will be absent to remove 85% of the forest cover in Santa Ana.

The fight to preserve urban forest cover is a story where bets are always high, from Malta to Hyderabad, as the measure that residents show extraordinary courage in opposing the interests of big industry to demand livable cities. In Madrid, the problem has been the city squares, where remodeling in recent years transformed public spaces into concrete expanses that direct tourists straight to the next artificial shop.

The question came in 2024, when plans to build an extension to the metro line were changed to require the removal of more than 1,000 trees, many in public parks near the edge of Madrid. Tired of their needs being ignored by the council, residents went out to protest. It worked: although many trees have been lost, only a few of the marked ones for removal were saved.

But, despite the opposition, the council did not give up. When the contract for €6.1m (£5.2m) to renew the underground parking under Santa Ana was awarded to
